family and community-based services at local level

WHAT IS DAY CARE SERVICE?

Children and families, persons with disabilities, elderly, minority groups and all persons left behind or living in the edges of poverty use social, family and community-based services on daily basis.

Community-based services and in particular day care services are designed and delivered for/with vulnerable individuals, groups and families to reduce or escape poverty and exclusion. It results in fuller and more satisfying lives, where most decisions on how to run a service and responsibility for its implementation rest at the community level, either with local government or civil society or in joint efforts.

There are different types of community-based services such as: home care and assistance for the elderly and persons with disabilities, day care services for different vulnerable groups, rehabilitation services for persons with disabilities, living with support services, respite care and many others. These services are filling gaps mainly in the social protection, socio-health, socio-educational and socio-employment areas, but they do not include the basic services which are sole responsibility of the state institutions such as: primary and secondary education, health care services, etc.

Community-based services provide opportunities for individuals to receive the services and support needed in their own home or community, rather than in institutions or other isolated settings. In this way, the services are helping individuals to maintain a sense of independence, security and also reduces stress, trauma and tensions which are usually associated with the change of a familiar environment. In parallel to this, these services are enhancing individuals' well-being, raise productivity and contribute to overall quality of life. In comparison to the institutional care they are less expensive.

In almost all the Western Balkans economies, the main providers of these services are the state through the public social protection institutions, local government units and the civil society sector. The central governments are the main provider of the community-based services although the experience in delivering these services is not very extensive. On the other side, the networks of available providers (public and private) of these services is small and limited, with weak developed internal capacities for providing quality services. However, the joint involvement of the stakeholders from the government, non-government and business sector is not a common practice although there are some good examples.
